

TABLE OF CONTENTS

	Page
I. The Russian Ruble Remains Insufficiently Convertible into the Currency of Other Countries to Consider Russia a Market Economy Country	1
A. Summary of Comment	1
B. The Department’s Standard	1
C. The Russian Ruble Is Not Sufficiently Convertible to Indicate Market Economy Status	1
II. Wage Rates in Russia Are Not Determined by Free Bargaining Labor and Management	3
A. Summary of Comment	3
B. The Department’s Standard	3
C. Workers in Russia Cannot Freely Negotiate Wage Rates and Other Conditions of Employment	4
III. The Russian Federation Does Not Adequately Permit Foreign Investment	8
A. Summary of Comment	8
B. The Department’s Standard	8
C. The Laws and Commercial Climate of Russia Severely Limit Foreign Investment	9
IV. The Government of the Russian Federation Maintains Extensive Ownership and Control of the Means of Production	14
A. Summary of Content	14
B. The Department’s Standard	14
C. Notwithstanding the Pro Forma Privatization of Many Russian Enterprises, the Russian Government Has Not Relinquished Control Over Certain Major Sectors of the Economy, and in Fact Is Currently Reasserting its Control of Certain Sectors	16

V.	The Russian Government Exercises Control Over the Allocation of Resources and Over the Pricing and Output Decisions of Key Enterprises	24
A.	Summary of Content	24
B.	The Department’s Standard	24
C.	The Russian Government Continues to Control Pricing and Allocation of Resources	26
a.	The Russian Government Maintains Tight Controls on the Pricing and Allocation of Natural Gas	26
b.	Soviet-Era Constraints Impede the Growth of New Businesses in Russia	28
c.	Russia Has Failed To Undertake Critically-Needed Banking Reform	31
VI.	Others Factors	34
A.	Summary of Comment	34
B.	Russia Cannot Be Considered a Market Economy Under U.S. Antidumping Law	34